Category:Chat historyQ: why does my loop in c++ use so many characters? why does my loop in c++ use so many characters? For example: for(;;) Why do I need to use ";"? A: The code probably doesn't require all those characters. The ; is an empty statement. The ; is used to break out of a loop. See If the code can be broken down into meaningful chunks it's probably much better formatted with some indention, like this. for (;;) { // Do something. } Boiling Water Falls Boiling Water Falls is a ribbon waterfall found along the Boiling Water Trail on the north side of Horseshoe Lake in Kenora District, Ontario, Canada. I would like to make a circle in Adobe Illustrator like the picture below: My question is: How do I make this look exactly like that? A: One easy way would be to use the Shape Builder tool. Select the Shape Builder tool from the toolbar Click and drag across any path you want to use for the shape Release the mouse button at the point you would like the shape to end, the shape will be adjusted and become solid at this point. A: Simply create the shape as you would any other shape and then go to stroke > stroke progress and change the Caps & Join to be jagged. Q: How to code a C++ function that accepts any number of arguments? I am writing my first class file for some school. The class is supposed to take in any amount of arguments, sort of like how printf works, but no spaces in between the arguments and no spaces at the end. I can't get it f678ea9f9e
